

B1: The role of stress in the response of mice to bacterial infections

Prof. Dr. C. Schütt

(schuett@uni-greifswald.de)

Institut f. Immunologie und Transfusionsmedizin, Abt. Immunologie

Ernst-Moritz-Arndt Universität Greifswald

Abstract

Graduate student: Cornelia Kiank

IL12/IFN γ pathways are playing a beneficial or deleterious role in combating bacterial infections or septic shock, respectively. We designed this study to investigate whether chronic psychological stress in mice (combination of acoustic and restraint stress) results in changes of immunocompetence and the conditioning of immune regulatory circuits that alter the outcome of bacterial infections.